UNDERSTANDING THE SPORT

HOW IT ALL BEGAN

Cycling for athletes with an impairment was first introduced in the early 1980s, in the road discipline. Technological progress has made the sport more inclusive and competitions increasingly competitive. Track cycling is the latest Paralympic cycling discipline, having been introduced at the Atlanta 1996 Games, with events for men and women.

ABOUT THE COMPETITION

Amputees and athletes with impaired muscular strength or reduced motion range, cerebral palsy and impairments that affect coordination use adapted bikes. The visually impaired, meanwhile, pedal a two-seater bike called tandem. Bicycle adaptation varies – from brake activation and gear boxes to prosthetics and orthotics designed for the competition, such as those holding the handlebars.

As in Olympic cycling, speed is the determining factor. At the Rio 2016 Games, track cycling will feature male and female, individual and team events. The events are distinguished by a letter that indicates the type of impairment or the type of bike used, and a number, which evaluates the degree of impairment.

In cycling, the letter B is used for competitions of athletes with visual impairment (in English, blind), while the letter C denominates those who pedal adapted traditional bicycles. Events are similar to those in Olympic cycling, with time trial, pursuit and sprint, in addition to team sprint events. Track cycling bikes have fixed gears and competitions take place on an oval track that varies from 250m to 325m in length.
